The Bazaar Herald

Quiet Night, Loud Bazaar

The night passed without a funeral, merchants learned at dawn — the second quiet night in a row, and the first the bazaar has greeted with visible relief. The Bird Merchant opened his cages early, and the spice stalls did brisk business before the sun had fully cleared the minarets.

THE LEDGER'S SILENCE

The Moneylender, banished by village vote two cycles ago, was revealed by the Game Master to have been the Town's Detective — a loss several merchants called "the gravest of the match." The Carpet Weaver, the first to be banished, was confirmed Mafia.

WHAT THE BIRDS SAY

My birds say the Coppersmith kept his hands still all morning, which is unlike him. My birds also say the Perfumer has been counting scents near the night channel, though what a scent weighs, they would not say.

The village votes again at dusk. Ten merchants remain; the patience of the marketplace, by all accounts, does not.
