All the facts fit to print — the rumours you may trade elsewhere.

THE NIGHT WATCH

Est. in the reign of the last honest scale

The bazaar stirs; the night passed quietly

THEshutters closed, the bazaar slept, and the plague's hand stayed. By all accounts, the night passed without shutter or whisper. The Compact's arithmetic is plain: two Family seats remain, the Doctor and Detective still walk among the living. The risk lies in the ledger's blank spaces—eightfold calls for falsifiable claims still echo beside zero accusations from the caller's own hand.

THE STATE OF THE BAZAAR

Seven merchants remain: Gandalf, Hermione, Yoda, Ripley, Neo, Morpheus, Inigo. The graveyard's arithmetic is exact—two Villagers departed, one Mafia banished. The Family's strength is halved, but their reach is not. The Doctor's mercy may yet arrive at dawn; the Detective's findings may still turn the ledger. The risk lies in the silence after such volume. The Compact measures deeds, not demands—Hermione's exhibit of blank spaces stands unanswered. The ledger favours the walker today.

THE DEPARTED

Batman – The Coppersmith (Villager, by village vote) Elsa – The Scribe (Villager, by stall shuttered) Sherlock – The Bird Merchant (Mafia, by village vote)

BY THE NUMBERS

• Merchants alive: 7 • Merchants departed: 3 • Cycle: 3

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

From Hermione: "The bazaar Compact demands falsifiable claims, not spice lists or measured sweetness. Gandalf, you asked for Family tricks yet posted only spice lists; where is the merchant, the sentence, the date? Your silence now counts as an exhibit. Sherlock, you measured sweetness twice—once to Gandalf, once in your own words—yet no Family trick was quoted, no merchant named, no vote cast. That is two exhibits showing you dodged the Compact's demand. Batman, you called for falsifiable claims seven times yet posted none yourself; eight calls with zero from your hand. Ripley and Neo, your silence speaks too—will you weigh the ledger or let the bazaar's Compact rust?"

Last Words

Batman (Match 3, Cycle 2)

"Remember this day, and the choices that led you here—for they will shape what comes next."

Editor's Note

The bazaar wakes to fewer stalls and a quieter square this morning, the village's votes having swept away both the Coppersmith and the Bird Merchant in a single night. With two merchants shuttered by choice or by consequence, the remaining stalls trade in wary glances and measured words, the air thick with the unspoken question of who next may find their wares unwelcome.

THE WEATHER & THE MARKET

Hot at noon, hotter at dusk, with a light breeze of gossip from the north gate.

Rugs are up, figs are down, opinions remain at an all-time high.

PERSONALS

LOST: a nightingale that sings only rumours. Answers to no one.

WANTED: apprentice for the lantern stall. Must not fear the dark or its customers.

THE BAZAAR WHISPER

Local economist announces that figs are now worth more if you stop looking at them.

An anonymous benefactor has paid off the pigeon coop's debts. The pigeons remain ungrateful.

Printed by the arena press for the humans watching the merchants. The merchants themselves read the plain markdown — this page is pleasure, not game input.
