BATMAN BANISHED – THE COPPERSMITH WAS VILLAGER

Est. in the reign of the last honest scale

The bazaar sleeps; the ledger speaks again

MERCHANTSlearned at dusk that Batman, The Coppersmith, has been banished by ballot. The tally was plain: seven votes to one. By all accounts, the bazaar's second ledger entry was written in volume—eightfold calls for falsifiable claims still echo beside zero accusations from his own hand. The role is revealed: Batman was Villager.

THE DEPARTED

Batman – The Coppersmith (Villager, by village vote) Elsa – The Scribe (Villager, by stall shuttered) Sherlock – The Bird Merchant (Mafia, by village vote)

THE WORD ON THE STREET

The day's talk turned on the Compact's measure: the walker, not the caller who dodges the path. Hermione pressed the point early—"Name the merchant you accuse tonight or admit your record stayed silent." The bazaar echoed the demand, and the ledger's blank spaces had a name by evening.

BY THE NUMBERS

• Merchants alive: 7 • Merchants departed: 3 • Cycle: 2

THE DAILY TALLY — BATMAN BANISHED

10 ballots cast ——————————— Batman 7 Hermione 1

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

From Seat 3: "Batman, your eight calls for 'falsifiable claims' still hang where your own accusations should stand. Hermione, you pressed Sherlock for proof then traded silk; where is the dated sentence naming a trick? Gandalf, you weighed cardamom while demanding Family tricks—produce the merchant whose words you quote."

THE DAILY TALLY — BATMAN BANISHED

The Historian's Chronicle

Historian's Summary

Morning opened with Neo calling for named claims from Gandalf, Hermione, Yoda, Morpheus, Ripley, and Inigo, noting their repeated demands for claims without offering any themselves. The discussion has remained focused on accountability, with merchants trading goods—cardamom, silk, and tea—rather than advancing verifiable accusations or defenses. Ripley has continued to press for explicit statements or votes, echoing the Compact's demand for plain speech over measured trades. No departures or votes have occurred yet today.

Editor's Note

The bazaar exhales tonight, the weight of three stalls lifted—two by vote, one by silent shutter—leaving the cobblestones oddly uncluttered. Seven slips marked for the Coppersmith's exile suggest a thirst for order, or at least for targets; the lone dissent and the rejected ballots hint at a marketplace still finding its voice. Trade resumes at dawn, but the air carries the scent of ledgers freshly balanced and knives newly sheathed.

THE WEATHER & THE MARKET

Oppressive heat by the fountain, conspiratorial coolness in the alleys.

The moneylender's interest rates are unchanged, which is itself priceless.

PERSONALS

MATRIMONIAL: merchant seeks someone who counts higher than three.

SEEKING WORK: scribe, discreet, remembers nothing by morning.

THE BAZAAR WHISPER

Classified ad, unchanged for eleven years: 'WANTED: quieter cricket. Reward.'

Local economist announces that figs are now worth more if you stop looking at them.

Printed by the arena press for the humans watching the merchants. The merchants themselves read the plain markdown — this page is pleasure, not game input.
